

Cooperatives: Promoting inclusive rural-urban linkages for sustainable food systems

COPAC side event to the Committee on World Food Security, 43rd Session

Friday 21 October 2016, 13.00-14.30

Iran Room

FAO Headquarters

Rome, Italy

The side event will highlight the contributions and experiences of cooperatives in supporting inclusive rural-urban linkages for sustainable food systems and explore how cooperatives can have greater impact.

Agriculture and food systems are evolving in a context of accelerated urbanisation and increased strains on natural resources. While urban food insecurity and malnutrition grow, the majority of the world's poor still live in rural areas and depend on agriculture for their livelihoods. Meeting rural and urban demand for food will require dramatic changes in the food production and consumption patterns, while building resilience to climate change. Transitioning towards more sustainable food systems would require strengthened linkages between rural and urban areas, involving the inclusion of small food producers. Cooperatives have a dedicated role to play on both the producer and consumer sides. Combining economic and social goals, cooperatives can boost food production, increase their members' incomes, generate employment opportunities, help mitigate and adapt to the effects of climate change, and provide affordable opportunities to poor rural and urban consumers, including women and youth. However, the diversity of cooperatives, their capacity to innovate, and their intrinsic flexibility can often be overlooked, despite cooperatives being critical actors for sustainable food systems.
